Message from the Guest Editors

The basic stainless steel sustainable dimensions are environmental/planetary, social/human, and economic/profit. If we connect this with sustainable manufacturing, the main purposes are environmental acceptability, lower processing costs, minimum energy consumption, healthcare staff, waste reduction, and operational safety.

The sustainability of stainless steel additive manufacturing is also an important topic of research in this area covered through environmental and economic evaluation, including stainless steel material recyclability and life cycle assessment and cost.

This Special Issue is intended for stainless steel research in sustainable machining and metal forming processes and additive manufacturing as a choice for ecosustainability. There is still a lack of knowledge around stainless steel sustainable manufacturing. In this Special Issue, we invite you to submit a worthwhile contribution to this still-under-researched field.
