Message from the Collection Editor

This Special Issue aims to address the relationships between higher education institutions and the employability/employment of graduates from around the world, including in developing countries, where higher education is presently in significant expansion. We invite authors to contribute to this Issue by submitting empirical or theoretical research triggering a broader reflection on the integration of sustainability, in its diverse definitions and conceptualizations, into the (higher) education of (future) workers from the natural sciences and social sciences.

Contributions around the following themes are particularly welcomed:

- The changing competencies required in order to respond to the needs of a changing labour market and/or societal needs informing future or ongoing work, and education programmes/strategies
- Development of effective partnerships, including international cooperation, between higher education and employment institutions
- Design, implementation and evaluation of innovative (higher) education and training programmes integrating work-related skills and non-cognitive transferable skills
