Message from the Guest Editors

Scientific knowledge about sport and physical activity has been experiencing significant growth in recent years. One of the main reasons for this strong growth has been the incorporation of new sustainable scientific methodologies that have helped address and respond to different problems related to sport.

The eruption of these sustainable methodologies has contributed (and continues to do so today) to the scientific development not only of competitive sport, but of any field that has to do with physical activity (school sport, initiation sport, physical activity for elderly, adapted physical activity, etc.). In turn, the use of different technological tools such as video recordings, GPS devices, etc. has helped in parallel with the increase in quality and quantity of the current scientific literature.

Studies and scientific works that focus on any aspect of physical activity and sport, and that contribute to increasing knowledge on this matter, will be welcome.
