

Special Issue

Vaccines and Animal Health

Message from the Guest Editors

There is no doubt that vaccines represent a crucial resource for veterinary medicine, allowing for effectively preventing burdensome infectious and parasitic diseases of both producing and companion animals, and aiding in the pursuit of the One Health vision. Nonetheless, research on animal vaccines is progressing continuously to cope with the emergence of novel epidemiological threats, changes in animal production, stronger link among owners and pets within the domestic environment and technological advancements. This Special Issue is aimed at collecting original research articles and reviews on the applications of vaccines in all fields of animal health, further advancing the knowledge of already available preparations or proposing novel solutions and applications.
